Bingo calling card 1- 75

When we're talking about calling cards, we're not talking about prepaid cards used to talk to loved ones on the phone. These may be interesting history, but if we were to ask why people used them, the answers would be mom wouldn't let me have a cell phone or they would be used as currency in prison. No, in this case, we're talking about social business cards, like the ones Jane Austen sucks, waiting with a breather to get from the sisters of the beautiful bachelors. Although calling cards were used until the 20th century in America, we are mainly talking about those used in the Georgian and Victorian eras of British history, circa 1714-1901. Under the simplest conditions, these calling cards showed that the visitor came from ol' homestead (or Grand London mansion). But don't think that calling cards wasn't terribly complicated and complicated the label behind it. Advertising Before we dive into some of the complexity of calling cards, let's talk about social speech in general. In the old days it was perfectly good just to fail someone's house conversation because you couldn't accurately call them up or text a warning. But dropping was something random. There were certain hours when women (and it was mainly women in leisure who did so) against callers, mostly in the afternoon. There were also morning calls that had nothing to do with time; you just wore a more casual dress than you'd wear in the usual afternoon calls [source: Mitchell]. Here come the calling cards. Just because you stopped by someone's house doesn't mean you were let in right away to see a lover. Instead, you (or your fiance, if you were in the carriage) may present your card to the butler, who would then let you know if your would-be hostess took calls. (Remember that it was perfectly acceptable not to take callers, even if you were at home.) If he wasn't, you'd leave your card as a sign that you stopped by. In some cases, you may simply leave your card without stopping to visit – marriage or grief may be worth such a card, for example. In general, cards had to be returned with cards and calls back within one week [source: Boyle]. But we're not done yet. Certain folds were occasionally used cards to show the reason for the visit, although different sources in certain cases refer to different rules. For example, a bent bottom left corner might have meant that you were telling the mistress of the house you were about to take to leave [source: AVictorian]. The exact meaning of all these folds and bends probably changed social structures and time. So the next time you stop by Chad to catch the tail end of a basketball game and he's not there, you know what to do. Leave your card with the butler and give him a week to call him back. If he doesn't? Treat it as a crime, which it is. Here's a training to try. Take your last credit card bill from your most commonly used credit card. Print it out if it's an electronic invoice; Otherwise, take the pen and put the bill on the table in front of you. Now, look through each item and ask yourself a few simple questions for each one. Was this thing a necessary purchase? If it is, put a little + next to that item on your bill. Simple enough – these costs should be obvious. Wasn't this purchase necessary, but actually really filling in when I look back? Just leave it empty. Don't tag anything next to it. Was this purchase not necessary, but actually not all that great when I look back? Put that item next to it. I don't remember what it was like, but I'm pretty sure it didn't matter. Put this item next to it. Now, go out and assemble all the items - next to them and see how many of these items are included. This is the amount of money spent on things that are truly forgettable that were not necessary and had no positive impact on your life. This money could have been used to pay off debts. It could have been used to save a deposit at home or in a car. It could have been used to save you from retiring through a Roth IRA contribution. These things quickly turn - into +. Even if you didn't necessarily want to spend that money on these things, it could at least use the things that were really fulfilling when you look back at them, like a meaningful day at the zoo with a family or a gas day trip to see your grandmother. These things move to a neutral column. This exercise is not meant to beat you up yourself. The truth is that everyone makes spending mistakes. When I look through my credit card statements, you better believe I'm going to put down a few things. The real purpose of this exercise is double. First, it will help you recognize how much of your spending is going towards things that are completely forgettable and have minimal life impact. People often don't know at the end of the month where all their money is gone, and the truth is that a lot of it goes towards completely forgettable things with little effect. While it's easy to acknowledge that truth in a general sense, this exercise makes it very specific and personal. This will show you how much your spending is forgettable and low impact. It even shows you exactly what those costs are. Secondly, it gives you a lot of knowledge when it comes to your future spending. For me, it's the real value of this type of exercise. It shows you, front and center, how much money you spend in an inefficient way, plus it tells you exactly where you spend it. You can take that information and use it to improve your spending habits going forward. How? Use this information to truly reshape your spending, do the following: First, search the data for patterns. Where you often spend money forgettable is that at the bar? A gas station? A safe store? Website? Are there certain types of products you often buy that you just forget? Soda? Alcohol? Coffee? Entertainment? Look for things that appear over and over again in your spending and see if you can make a short list of some of these patterns. Second, explain the clear, specific life changes that cut down your spending in terms of patterns you've noticed. You have some clear patterns that define your forgettable expenses. What are you going to do about these things? For example, if you spend a lot of money on forgettable things on the Internet, consider deleting your credit card number from frequently used online stores, especially those where you buy forgettable things. If you often buy lemonades or alcohol or other consumer products that you just forget about, make it your goal to cut those habits (it's probably better for your health, too). If you find that a ton of expense is associated with a particular friend or social group, choose your time with these people and spend time with friends who don't need spending. Thirdly, implement these changes. Ideally, you now have one or two real tangible changes that you can implement... implementation of them. It can be a difficult thing to do, so here are some suggestions to make them click. First, remind yourself of these initiatives every morning, early morning. Put aside a few minutes to specifically think about these goals. Put them on a big note in your bathroom mirror so you can think of them when you're brushing your teeth, or put them on a lock screen on a smartphone by taking a picture of these ideas. I find that looking at these focal points right before or immediately after meditation or prayer (something I do every morning) is very useful in terms of locking these ideas into my skull. Second, just focus on today. Don't worry about the failures of the past or the road ahead of you. Just worry about you taking care of these things today. If one of your initiatives is to reduce online spending, just choose not to spend money online today on anything. If one of your initiatives is to stop drinking alcohol, focus today on not drinking and use other outlets for your emotions. If you have an initiative that involves making social changes, make an active choice to spend time raising a new friend or two today. Today is important. Third, evaluate today before you go to sleep. As much as you do in the morning, spend a moment or two pondering your initiative at the end of the day. Did you manage to avoid drinking? Hooray! Success! If you didn't, why did it happen? This is not the end of life has made a mistake, but it should be seen as an opportunity to understand why you took the wrong step and focus on taking care of the cause of the curtain. I find that repeated failures mean that I have to work on something other than a daily goal, because there are some challenge in another part of my life that doesn't work out right, so setting that second challenge has to be the first. Fourth, make (and continue) the success of the chains. When I work to create a new normal in my life, it usually comes from consciously repeating a daily habit until it's so normal that I don't have to think anymore. I find that this is going to happen around the 30-day mark, but don't actually lock in a permanent minimum of 90 days of continuous repeating. To keep myself motivated, I use the success chain system. I have a white board in my office where I have my top two or three day goals listed. Next to each goal is a line xs. Every day, when I've successfully done that thing, I add an X to that line. If I haven't done it successfully, I'll erase the entire line. I often look at this board during my morning assessment of my daily goals, because maintaining that chain of Xs has a lot of psychological power. Use these strategies together to implement the changes you made and actually cut back on unnecessary spending on your life. Finally, see how these changes affect your spending in the next billing cycle. Skip a month and review the first full billing cycle after you apply these changes. Go through and do the same +, and - use the above described. Ideally, you'll notice a lot of positive changes, probably enough that you immediately notice it on your lower-than-normal credit card balance or your higher-than-usual bank balance. That feels good. That's good. The best part? Since it's spending that really doesn't matter to you, it's easy to keep it going. You can do it. It's this type of cyclical pattern - looking for the mistakes you make, looking for actionable steps to improve them, applying these steps, and then controlling the results - that are behind almost every type of positive change people apply in their lives. Personal information is no different. Weeding through forgettable spending is a particularly powerful type of change because you're letting go of things that really aren't very meaningful to you and replacing it with much more meaningful uses of your money, plus you can clearly see the impact of months on your bank statements and credit card bills. Give this little tech a chance. You're pretty happy with the changes it brings. Editorial Note: Compensation does not affect our recommendations.
